In this institution I desire that the students may be taught to be able to earn their own living, and to be able in the end to support themselves. I have spoken of the importance of education, as it is the one means of improving the condition of the lower classes, of making them independent of the higher classes, and of securing to them a place in society. The true value of education is not to be measured by the amount of knowledge imparted, but by the effect it produces on the moral and intellectual faculties of the individual. The object of education is to fit the individual for his station in life, and to make him capable of doing his duty to his country and to his neighbors. The true value of education is to be found in its power to make men good, and to fit them for useful and happy careers.

We must remember that the greatest wealth is not to be found in gold or silver, but in the minds of men. The true value of a country is not to be measured by the amount of its wealth, but by the character of its people. The true value of education is to be found in its power to make men good, and to fit them for useful and happy careers. The true value of education is to be found in its power to make men good, and to fit them for useful and happy careers. The true value of education is to be found in its power to make men good, and to fit them for useful and happy careers.